Not illustrated. 1876 Excerpt: . . . sympathy upon its brethren, then in the first flush of its larger love it desires the public righteousness, --that the world of men, with which it feels itself one, may be righteous; that every evil may be put down, and justice and peace and good-will and a pure glory prevail throughout society. The youth chooses his field, --the Church, the State, the court, the market, or the general social life of his neighborhood. He studies the principles of his work. He enters it. But he finds this part of it not to his taste, --too much iniquity in it, a very mixed state of men and things connected with it, not much like his first notions of it. He tries another part, and behold it is the same there. The same kind of human being with all his peculiarities is there also. His love waxes cold;...
